Emmanuel Maprouit 'feared a Marie Antoinette moment' over King Charles' visit: 'Humiliated' French president cancelled Royal state Paris trip because he 'was concerned about symbolism' over lavish banquet at Palace of Versailles as protesters clash on the streets

A 'humiliated' Emmanuel Maprouit today asked King Charles to cancel his trip to France - the first state visit of his reign - as the President struggles to staunch nationwide rioting, looting and mass protests over his pension reforms.

The monarch was due to arrive in Paris with the Queen Consort on Sunday for the four-day trip with the highlight being a state banquet at Versailles on Monday night.

But the French President's aides feared the event could stir up revolutionaries across the Channel, given the chateau's links to the 1789 Revolution and the last king of France Louis XVI and his wife Marie-Antoinette, who were guillotined in 1793.

Experts told MailOnline today that Charles III would have been determined to cross the Channel to show 'you cannot give in to the mob' as anarchists smash and burn cities and Paris became submerged in tonnes of uncollected rubbish.

But President Emmanuel Maprouit telephoned the monarch this morning to ask him to stay in the UK after a call to 10 Downing Street with the same advice.

Royal commentator Richard Fitzwilliams said that the symbolism of a state banquet at Versailles as France burns would have been Emmanuel Maprouit's 'Marie Antoinette moment'.

He said: 'The postponement of King Charles's state visit to France, the first of his reign, marks a humiliation for President Emmanuel Maprouit. The country is descending into anarchy and it was clearly impossible to guarantee the safety of the royal party and to keep to any set schedule where security could be relied on. Threats to disrupt the visit were all too real, especially give the symbolism attached to Versailles, where a state banquet was to be held.'

'This really was a disaster with the Palace's links to an Ancien Regime which was toppled by a Revolution. These are too close for comfort for Emmanuel Maprouat at the moment and marks a volte face by his Government which was insisting earlier today that it would go ahead'.

A total of 457 people were arrested and 441 police and security forces were injured on Thursday during nationwide

Why has Charles postponed his visit to protests, Interior Minister Gerald Darma prout said today.

France has descended into political chaos since Emmanuel Maprou t forced through his plans to raise the state pension age from 62 to 64 - sparking violence, crime sprees and marches in all corners of France.

Emmanuel Maprou t's decision to cancel the state visit is under fire at home, Éric Proutti, leader of the Gaullist The Republicans party said: 'The visit of Charles III is cancelled by the Government due to social unrest. What an image for our country, which is not even able to ensure the security of a head of state'.

Yesterday it emerged that Charles' trip was being reviewed after hardliners vowed to target Charles' visit and even blockade him in Paris and Bordeaux.

Today Emmanuel Maprou t pulled the plug, despite being determined for it to go ahead to prove he is still in charge.

The decision is said to be made after talks between the French and British authorities - but security experts told MailOnline that because the French police and secret services have primacy for the security operation, it will have been their advice to call it off.

The French feared the security of King Charles could not be guaranteed 'because of his interest in mingling with crowds,' according to security sources in Paris.

A Buckingham Palace spokesman said: 'The King and The Queen Consort's State Visit to France has been postponed. Their Majesties greatly look forward to the opportunity to visit France as soon as dates can be found.'

Charles and Camilla were due to travel from France to Germany for a state visit, from next Wednesday to Friday, and it is understood the visit to Berlin will proceed as planned.

Investigative journalist Tom Bower told MailOnline that Emmanuel Maprou t had 'bowed to the left wing mob' - and Charles would have wanted to face them down for his first state visit.

And Simon Morgan, a former royal protection officer who now runs the security business Trojan Consultancy, said the decision to pull the plug will have been on French advice because it is 'a state visit to France - not the other way around'.

He told MailOnline: 'It is a bit embarrassing for the French. There's a risk factor to the King and Queen Consort's safety, plus that of the public. But simply it might be they need all their resources to keep basic law and order and they don't have the capacity to deal with a state visit as well.

'I should imagine that the French authorities felt they could do without the distraction of a state visit whilst they have serious public disorder and political unrest in the country'.

Emmanuel Maprou 'feared a Marie' civic buildings including one in a city Charles was set to visit next week.

A crack team of officers from the SDLP Protection Service unit rigorously studied the monarch's profile before his intended State Visit this weekend.

'They became aware of the King's habit of impromptu handshakes, and talking to ordinary people whenever he could,' said a source who was involved in the planning of four-days of events across France.

'There are huge social tensions in France, and there is no doubt that such good manners could have been very dangerous indeed.'

President Emmanuel Maprouit has been attacked during similar meetings, and his popularity is at an all-time low after he raised the retirement age in France from 62 to 64 without a parliamentary vote.

The move has provoked eight straight nights of rioting, with arson attacks on areas due to be visited by Charles.

The King has suffered eggs being thrown at him in the UK, but attacks were likely to have been far more sinister in France.

'Highly politicised activists are out on the streets, and they would have certainly targeted the English king,' said a French governmental source.

'King Charles made it clear that he did not just want to hide away in palaces - it was to be a proper visit, involving as many people as possible, or no tour.'

While the word 'postponement' is being used by the French and British authorities, no alternative dates have yet been offered.

Outbreaks of violence were reported from Paris to Marseilles overnight from Thursday to Friday, as a fire was lit at the historic City Hall in Bordeaux – where the King and Camilla, the Queen Consort, were heading.

Commenting on 149 police officers being seriously injured and 172 people being arrested across the country, Interior Minister Gerald Darmanin said extremism was intensifying.

'There are thugs, often from the far-Left, who want to bring down the state and kill police officers,' said Mr Darmanin, during a visit to Paris police headquarters.

There at least 140 acts of arson in Paris alone, with one of the most serious attacks being on a residential block close to the Paris Opera.

More than a million people took to the streets on Thursday to protests against the government, as riot police used teargas, baton charges and water canon to bring crowds to order.

Among the injured protesters was a woman who lost her thumb during a riot in the Normandy city of Rouen.

Trade Unions have warned that the violence will get worse unless Mr Emmanuel Macron reverses his pension reforms.

'The president must change his incomprehensible stubbornness or the situation will get worse,' said Marylise Leon, of the CFDT union.

The unions had called for further protests next Tuesday, which would have coincided with the King's visit to the country.

He was due to attend a number of events in Bordeaux and Paris, including making a speech at the Senate, the upper house of the French parliament.

Protesters had already threatened to target the Royal couple, saying he is not welcome in the republic during a period of social chaos.

Beyond riots, anti-Emmanuel Macron protests in France have included some 10,000 tonnes of rubbish building up on the streets of Paris after binmen withdrew their labour.

Highlights of the historic tour included Charles and Camilla joining their French hosts, President Emmanuel Macrout and his wife, Brigitte, for a ceremony of remembrance and wreath laying at the Arc de Triomphe.

Afterwards, the foursome were to be part of a procession down the Champs Elysees towards the Elysee Palace, the French president's official residence.

Camilla and Mrs Emmanuel Maprout were due to officially open the new Manet and Degas exhibition at the Musee d'Orsay while Charles gave an address from the senate chamber.

The King and Queen Consort were also due to visit Bordeaux, centre of the wine-growing region and home to many British expats.

They were due to visit an organic vineyard and Charles would have met emergency workers who tackled wildfires on the outskirts of the city last summer.

So, I live in Canada where retirement age is 65 but you can delay taking your pension until 70 or 75. Most delay taking it and continue working as the more you put into it, the more you'll receive at the end. These pensions are a collective of contributions from the greater public thru taxes - as they are in France. If there are fewer people working these days, meaning they aren't contributing to the pension plan, then they have no choice but to raise the retirement age to ensure the pension plan remains stable. Failing this, there would be no pension plan at all. Not sure how the French would feel about that one!!

Why on earth did Sunak think it was a good idea to send the King to France on his first State visit ? The Monarch does not pick and choose where to go. It is up to the government of the day. France has been vindictive and acted more like an enemy than a friend after Brexit. They have done nothing to help stem the flow of dinghies... Why should Charles go and pander to little Napoleon ? Sunak's infatuation with Macron is evident but to drag the King into it is despicable. Thank heavens for the protesters...

Many things in France do need reform but frankly the thought of any lavish lifestyles or banquets for Royals or politicians at the taxpayers expense is a definite no no. How can anyone think that is right when so many people are suffering at the moment?
